"PRIDE AND PREJUDICE"

"You're a riot!" David Dog hooted. He doubled himself up on the floor, to show how amused he was. "Who do you think you're fooling?"

Clarissa Cat put her nose up in the air and answered in a huffy voice, "I'm sure I don't know what you're talking about, foolish dog."

"Foolish cat, you mean," David laughed. "Pretending to be so dignified, when you fall down. I saw you just now, clumsy puss. You slipped on the wax floor and took a tumble, but would you admit you took a tumble? Oh no, not you, Madame Queen. You pretended right away that you'd gone down on the floor on purpose, to look under the sofa for something. But I knew you took a tumble! Haha!" And the dog began to chant, making fun of the cat, "Clarissa went boom-de-boom! Clarissa went boom-de-boom! Clarissa went—"

The cat arched her back very haughtily. Her whiskers bristled out straight. She hissed, "I'll get even with you someday, mean doggie. You wait and see." She was really upset, for if there's one thing cats can't stand —besides dogs, of course, and bells on their necks—it's being made to feel foolish and clumsy. After all, as Clarissa well knew, cats—and 'specially sleek proud Persian cats of her queenly type—must always be poised and snobbish, must never be awkward.

David, too, in his own collie-king way, was very proud. He didn't like to seem like a fool, either, and be laughed at. Clarissa Cat knew this, so she waited and waited for her revenge. Each day, at dusk, David would run out barking happily as he greeted his master at the gate. But, Clarissa knew, David also spent a lot of time all day barking savagely at strangers who passed the yard. She waited for the afternoon when David would finally make a mistake. And then the day came. . . .

Clarissa watched. The master arrived at the gate. But as David dashed out at the sound of the latch, the late setting sun cast its rays into his eyes, blinding him for a moment. He could not see that it was his master, so, mistaking him for a stranger, he ran out barking his horrible mean savage bark, meant only for strangers.

"Why David!" his master said, shocked.

But before his master could say more, David, suddenly aware of his error, did what he could to cover up his mistake. "Woof! Woof woof!" he kept on barking savagely, dashing past his master towards another dog who was out on the street. "Woof!"

"Oh my," said his master, patting him kindly as he returned a moment later to the gate. "For a moment I thought you were barking that awful way at me!"

David nuzzled his master, to show him that he would never fail to recognize him. But later Clarissa cornered the dog, and hissed triumphantly, "Foolish pup! I saw what happened! You barked mean at your master, and then you pretended you hadn't! I saw! Ha ha! Such a fool!"

The dog crawled away under the sink. Queen Cat could lose her dignity sometimes, and so could King Collie . . . but, at least, no one but the two of them would ever have to know!
